Trout Fishing.

From the New York Sun, July 26.

Twin Ponds, Franklin County, N. Y.
Thursday, July 15, 1875.

A ride of four hours over the Ogdensburg and Rouse's Point Railroad took me from Monty's Bay to South Bangor, well up in the Adirondack region. Here I was met by a nephew of the veteran Uncle Sim Doty, who had made due preparation to take me out fishing.

"I have got my shanty all ready for you," he said. "When do you want to go?"

"Immediately, if the fishing is good," I replied.

"Well, I guess you can catch all you will want to eat, though you are a little late," said he. "I have got arrangements all made to take you through to the Twin Ponds, and on the way up you can do some fishing in the brooks. We will go up over Hog Back and wet our lines in Pitcher Lake, though it is not likely we shall catch many fish there."

The rest of the day was spent in getting ready for the trip in the woods. A stock of provisions seemingly sufficient to last two men a fortnight was first carefully packed and stowed away in the wagon; then there was a thorough overhauling of fishing tackle to see that everything was in order. Flies were critically examined, hooks tested and fastened to the lines, and the bandanna handkerchiefs, to be used in the emergency of the fish refusing to bite at anything else, carefully stowed in my fishing-boat. Then we dug about two quarts of angle worms, and everything was ready, as I supposed, for a start. But not so. We were destined to get other bites than those of trout, and my friend proceeded to compound a preparation to be applied to the hands and face while fishing.

Bait for Black Flies and Mosquitoes.

“You see,” said he, “at this time of the year the black flies, mosquitoes and deer flies are pretty thick in the woods, and unless you use something on your hands and face to keep them from biting you, they will drive you out of the woods in a hurry.”

“What do you use?” I asked.

“Well, it ain’t exactly as sweet smelling as cologne water,” he replied, “but you will find it a mighty sight more useful. You see I take about a tablespoonful of tar and put kerosene enough into it to cut it, and then I add about a pint of sweet oil. As long as you keep your hands and face well bathed with that the flies won’t touch you; but if you don’t you won’t take much comfort fishing, if, in fact, you fish at all.”

Experience proved the truth of what he said, and I advise every sportsman who goes into the woods in June or July to give this preparation a trial. It is not, as my friend said, so inviting as cologne water, but this it is that keeps the flies and mosquitoes away from you. During my trip to this point I was constantly surrounded by myriads of these pests; but so long as I kept my hands and face well bathed with the preparation not one alighted on them. But when (as occasionally happened in the excitement of the sport) I neglected to apply it frequently, and it had dried up or worn off, I was soon reminded of the fact by the terrible onslaught that they made upon me. I found it preferable to nettings worn over the head and face.

Off for the Fishing Region.

Before sunrise the next day we were on our way to the woods, a son of Dr. Doty taking us in a wagon as far as it was possible to go in such a conveyance, and at that point we packed our luggage on our backs. On our way we had been joined by a Mr. Adams and son, and with them we traveled to Hog's Back, a sharp ridge about three miles long and 500 feet high. It is heavily timbered with spruce, hemlock, birch and maple, and at its highest point is situated Lake Pitcher, so named from its fancied resemblance to a pitcher. It is formed entirely from springs which abound all through this region, and the water is the coldest and purest I ever drank. The lake is about one-fourth of a mile long and about one-sixteenth in width. From here we saw the St. Lawrence River and Canada. There was no boat on the lake, and as the sun was shining full upon it, we soon became convinced that it was useless to fish there, and besides it was too hot for comfort; and descending on the other side of Hog Back, within a few minutes we were in the cool shade and beside a brook about the width of Nassau street, running over a sandy, pebbly bottom.

"This brook comes from the Twin Ponds," said Doty; "and I guess you will be able to catch some some trout here. You can try it, and I will go ahead a little and build up a fire, so that we can cook some dinner." Suiting the action to the word he shouldered the basket containing our food and dining utensils and started off up the brook, while I hastened to rig a line upon a pole.

And by the way, my pole was a somewhat novel one, but it proved to be just the thing for brook fishing; and being so convenient to carry, I will describe it for the benefit of others who may desire to visit the wilderness to catch brook trout. It is made of brass in the shape of a walking cane, with an ivory head. Walking Broadway it might readily be mistaken for ebony, as it is painted black. But the ferrule at the bottom can be unscrewed and taken off, and then three brass tubes fitting into each other may be drawn out until you have a splendid trout pole about twelve feet in length, that can be lengthened or shortened at will. After several years' experience with all kinds of rods in fishing for brook trout, I am satisfied that it is the best and most convenient pole I ever used.

The Sport.

Selecting one of Buell’s red and gray hackle flies, and baiting the hook with part of an angle worm, I dropped my line into the brook. It had scarcely touched the water before it was seized by a speckled beauty weighing about one-fourth of a pound. Before abandoning this spot I caught fifteen, and then I moved on up the brook, dropping in wherever there was a log across the brook, or where the action of the water had worn a hole in the bank at the root of some large tree or around a bowlder, hardly ever failing to catch from one to half a dozen out of each hole. Within a few minutes I met Doty coming back to see whether I had any trout. He selected about forty to cook for dinner. This he was not long in getting ready, and though the menu was hardly so extensive as Delmonico’s, yet I venture to say that there never was a more enjoyable dinner served up by that celebrated caterer. A beautiful spring which burst from the rocks near by took the place of Delmonico’s wine.

After our dinner our few cooking utensils and other traps were repacked, and we started for the shanty at the foot of Twin Ponds, about two miles distant. Adams and myself fished up the brook, and Doty carried the basket containing the provisions. On our arrival at the shanty we counted 203 of the speckled beauties, varying from three to ten inches in length. We decided not to try the ponds that night, and immediately commenced preparations for cooking supper and camping for the night. A large cooking stove was in the shanty, having been left there by the men who were building the dam last winter. A rousing fire was soon started in this, Doty taking charge of the culinary department, while Adams and myself cleaned about fifty trout for supper.

Barnum’s Stuffed Panther.

“Right over there,” said Adams, pointing toward a high hill on the other side of the pond, “was killed the largest panther ever seen in this part of the country. Barnum bought the skin and stuffed it, and I used to see it in his old Museum corner of Broadway and Ann street. You see,” he continued, “he had been prowling around these parts for a long time, doing a good deal of damage killing cattle, &c., and finally three men started out, determined to kill him if possible. They took one rifle, an old British musket, a bull-dog, and a quart of whisky. About noon of the second day the dog drove the panther up a big hemlock tree over on that hill, and the hunters came up with him. There was just one drink of whisky left in the bottle, which they drank; then they joined hands and danced a hornpipe about the foot of the tree, the panther meantime growling and lashing his tail. Then the best shot of the three took the rifle, and stepping back a few paces put a ball under the panther’s fore shoulder, knocking him off the limb. As he touched the ground the dog grappled with him; and while he and the panther were fighting, another of the party caught the panther by the tail, and the third placed the old British musket under the fore shoulder and sent a handful of slugs through his heart. This settled him. I suppose his skin was burned the time the Museum was burned or you might see it there now.”

Then Doty told about trapping a large bear within forty rods of where we were. It was now within two hours of dark and we started to get the boat, which we expected to find hid in the bushes a short distance from the shore. Some one had been there and taken the boat away, and a fruitless search of over an hour failed to discover it. It was now time to prepare for camping for the night, and we returned to the shanty somewhat disappointed about the boat, but consoled with the knowledge that on the morrow another party, consisting of Messrs. Foster, Wells and G. Adams, would be there with a boat.

Adams cut a sufficient quantity of hemlock branches from a tree near by to make a bed sufficiently large and soft for us all. Then a “smudge” fire to drive off the gnats and mosquitoes, which were getting a little troublesome, was built in front of the shanty. Then our pipes were again lighted and we chatted pleasantly until the moon had risen over the tops of the trees. Then, taking off our boots, hats and coats, we went to bed and slept until daylight the next morning on our bed of hemlock boughs. In the night I heard the barking of a wolf at no great distance, and a screech-owl took up its position on a tree a short distance from the shanty and serenaded us for several hours. Before breakfast I took my line and pole and going to the brook caught a few trout.

269 Speckled Beauties.

After breakfast it was agreed that Doty and I should spend the day fishing in the brook, and that the rest of the party, when the boat came, should go up the ponds. With this understanding we separated, and at night Doty and I counted 269 as handsome brook trout as ever were seen.

I have been about a week in this country, and have caught over 500 trout, and might have caught as many more.

“How far is it from here to Paul Smith’s?” I asked of Adams, as we sat in front of the shanty door one evening.

“Just about thirty miles south, right through the woods,” he replied.

“Is the fishing as good there as it is here?” I asked.

“No, sir,” he replied. “You can catch fifty trout here where you can one there. The fact is they have almost exterminated the trout in the lakes over there with their set lines and gill nets, and about all the trout they get to eat are sold to the big hotels by men who catch them on set lines, or who go after them away in the woods to the ponds and brooks that the popinjays of fashion never see.”

This statement was subsequently confirmed by Hon. William A. Wheeler, whom I met in Malone, and who told me that he had visited Paul Smith’s every season for the past fifteen years, and that fishing in that region had been utterly ruined by the use of set lines, gill nets, &c. And yet people who profess to be fond of the sport will visit these fashionable fishing resorts year after year, pay fabulous hotel bills, and perhaps catch half a dozen trout during the season, when by entering this great wilderness at fifty other points they may enjoy the true sports of trout fishing at less than one-fourth the expense. But unless they are prepared to rough it a little, I would not advise them to try it. Twin Ponds, as well as the numerous other ponds and brooks in this section which abound with trout, can be reached in about four days from New York city.
